

A woman that I admire is my Mom. My Mom does multiple jobs, she attends to three different kids, she is my teacher, my mom, and my friend. She does things that I know I would never be able to do myself.

I have two siblings, ages 8 and 5. Whenever one of us disobeys, or my younger siblings lose their temper she always deals with us in a calm way. Sometimes my tone of voice can start to sound angry or annoyed but she never acts meanly. She will just remind me to change it. Whenever I have to do my chores I always feel like I am doing so much work, but then I have to remember how much work my Mom does and that she never complains.

My Mom is my teacher. Me and my siblings are homeschooled, so since I have two siblings she is teaching three different grades at once! My Mom makes all our units really fun, she does lots of experiments and hands-on learning. We learn about lots of different topics and I've learned so much just over the past year. All the units she chooses are so different, but they're all just as interesting. What is really cool is that my Mom teaches me and my siblings all the same units at the same time, but we each get to do work specifically for our own grade.

On top of all the other jobs she does, she is my Mom. She takes care of me, makes me meals, does the laundry, and makes me feel loved. She buys me everything I need and more.

My Mom does so many things for me. I really don't know how to thank her. Even though my mom might not be on the cover of a book, she is worthy of anything anyone could ever have.
